Campus Kind Of Boring Without Incredible Football Team, Awful President

According to a recent poll conducted amongst students, campus life has become "intolerably boring" without a championship-level football team or incompetent president for the community to rally around.

"There's just nothing to do around here anymore," explained sophomore Wyatt Adams. "Like football games suck because all we do is lose or win, but in a really lame way. Meanwhile I haven't gotten any chances to egg the president's house recently. What are we even doing here?"

Experts say the transition to a less dramatic campus life has been especially rough given the back-to-back Schlissel and Ono administrations. According to their findings, students may have become addicted to the adrenaline rush they got from seeing their university's name in a headline.

"The kids here don't know what it's like to have a president that isn't fucking his secretary or trying to violently suppress free speech. Having a guy that just pops out to ask students trivia on Saturdays in the middle of an underwhelming game just doesn't strike the same chord," said Dr. Jared Hopps, a professor in the psychology department.

Over 80% of the poll's respondents said that they were unaware that the university even had a president right now. Of the remaining 20%, only one student correctly named the interim president as Domenico – not Dominic – Grasso. 100% of the respondents said they were dissatisfied with the offensive line's performance over the past few games.

Reports indicate that in the absence of anything interesting to talk about, some students have resorted to hibernating until the beginning of basketball season, while others spend their days sulking around the Diag trying to goad the security guards into doing "literally anything."

CAPS has reported an increase in the number of students struggling to cope with the "complete apathy" they feel towards campus life.

Trump Demolishes White House Facade, Installs Wall Of Living, Screaming Faces

This past Wednesday, Trump moved forward with demolishing the entire East Wing of the White House in accordance with his renovation plan, which aims to replace the section of the historic building with "a wall of living human faces that can feel pain and scream constantly."

"I am pleased to announce that the East Wing has been demolished to make way for the FREEDOM SCREAMS WALL OF FACES," said Trump in a Truth Social post. "The WHITE HOUSE will be more beautiful than ever. The wall will inspire GENERATIONS of Americans."

Reports indicate that a sign displayed next to the faces will read "DO NOT FEED THEM."

The President rejected suggestions from the press that the renovation might be perceived by the public as a departure from the usual decorum of the presidency, claiming that "this is what the American people want, and have wanted, for a very long time. We're going to make, well, some are calling it the greatest improvement to the White House ever. Yes, even the screaming faces, they agree too, they say it's the best addition to the building yet."

Press Secretary Karoline Leavitt confirmed that the faces will be screaming "out of pain, yes, but also out of abject existential terror. They are not truly alive, nor can they ever die."

The White House has not disclosed the source of these faces, but have assured the public that "like the staff inside," the facade will remain "completely and purely white." Further, financial watchdogs were offered assurances that the project will be entirely privately funded from a combination of President Trump's own fortune and "good, old fashioned bribes."

White Boy Shocks Union Panda Express Worker By Ordering Orange Chicken In Perfect Mandarin

Floor manager of the Union Panda Express, Jacquelyn Cho, was "shocked when the whitest dude [she] had ever seen ordered orange chicken in perfect Mandarin."

The "white boy" in question was senior Asian Studies major Benjamin Smith. According to Smith, he used a pretty simple phrase that "perfectly encapsulated a Beijing yakuza vibe."

"Yea, so I pretty much just said '兄弟，怎么了，可以给我-Orange-Chicken-白米饭和双橙鸡吗?,'" Smith said. "'兄弟' is slang for 'bro', and I used it just to show I am an amicable and well cultured bái rén."

Cho, a native of Grosse Pointe, has "never even spoken, let alone learned, Mandarin." According to Cho, Smith "seemed flustered when [she] didn't understand him."

"I'm just working at Panda Express for some extra beer money," Cho said. "So when he came up with a whole camera crew and ordered in Mandarin, I was shocked because he seemed to be getting frustrated that I had no clue what he was saying. Plus, he was adding in his own sound effects. You're supposed to do that in post!"

According to Smith, he was "disappointed" with the service at Panda Express.

"I go to Panda Express because it is the closest thing I can get to authentic Chinese cuisine here in Ann Arbor," Smith said. "I get really upset when I lose the immersion that I have learned about in my manhua books. I mean, where else am I supposed to practice the beautiful language?"

At press time, Smith was seen with his Italian major friend Mark Stucco at Olive Garden. Stucco and Smith were visibly upset when the waitress did not understand when Stucco said "Vorrei una birra bionda e le polpette, per favore, grazie mille! Hai un bello sorriso, che bella!"

Pre-Dental Frat Bros Getting Fucked Up On Listerine Tonight

Members of Delta Alpha Delta, U-M's fraternity for dental students, reported plans to get inebriated via Listerine mouthwash later this evening.

"It's just so convenient," reported Zack Taylor, a brother of Delta Alpha Delta. "I love that each bottle comes with its own little shot glass," he said, pointing to the cap. Others cited Listerine's bright, inviting hue and 24-hour cavity protection as benefits of abusing the substance. "They have such a good variety of flavors, like Cool Mint, Ultraclean, Clinical Solutions, or even Watermelon, if you're a pussy. Or if you're a child aged 3-6 with a history of tooth sensitivity," continued Taylor.

"Haha yeah I've been riding the L train all night long," said one intoxicated fraternity brother. "That shit kills 99.9% of the germs that cause bad breath, plaque, and gingivitis." The brother then proceeded to vomit up 99.9% of the contents in his stomach.

Non-members of the fraternity have also weighed in on this behavior. Pre-law junior Samantha Lewis said, "Yeah, I went to one of their mouthwash ragers once. I tried to hook up with a dental student there but he just extracted one of my wisdom teeth and told me I needed to floss more. I try to go there at least once every six months, but honestly I keep forgetting."

Party attendees claim that "toothpaste rage cage" is a significantly slower-paced game than the traditional version.

Nine out of ten fraternity brothers recommend getting fucked up on Listerine. The tenth one is the only brother who is just a regular alcoholic.

Huge shoutout to the Kiwami Japan youtube channel. You have stepped up where Mr. Beast has failed us, and we will be forever grateful, at least until you make a knife out of the charred corpse of a man who was LOCKED IN A BURNING BUILDING FOR A CHANCE AT WINNING $500,000!!!!!!! In some ways, nothing about layout has changed at all.
Additional and (debatably) more important shoutout to our new staff. You guys did a fantastic job and your work is hilarious. We hope you stick around with us to keep doing extra homework for years to come. Always feels good to be reassured that people care about this kind of thing and actively want to be part of making it.
An extra acknowledgment to my current PolSci classes, where we've been tackling the tough questions in class debates, like "Should gay marriage be legal?" and "Are trans people real?" Very dignifying experience, I love the culture of open discourse. Unrelated, have you guys heard that conservatives are being silenced in higher education? Chilling stuff, really.
Hey guys, it's Hannah. I just want to apologize for being late to layout each day this week. Apparently my microwavable dinners needed to be defrosted ahead of time and that was a whole ordeal. Anyways, to echo what Seamus said: huge thank you to the rookies. Y'all rock! Glad we could all churn out this fantastic issue before Bari Weiss takes over this paper and starts making us publish centrist slop about why starving children are lying.

New Study Reveals Students Posting On Piazza Are Actually Real People

According to a recent study released by the Department of Electrical Engineering and Computer Science, Piazza, known by many students as "that website from the syllabus that you forgot existed," is actually getting used by real people.

"I thought it had to be an AI or something," said Bill Stillwater, a junior in MECHENG 240. "We all thought the GSIs were making them up so that they could pretend they were actually teaching, I mean, nobody in our class is actually wondering why platinum is used in airbags."

"What's Piazza again?" said Allen Chen, a freshman taking ENGR 100, who still receives weekly emails summarizing the posts on the website. "Oh yeah, I just delete those emails when I get them. You're telling me real people post that much? I just use Chat GPT when I have a question."

"While we have identified that humans are the ones writing the questions, we are still unsure where they are actually located," clarified Jamie Murphy, a researcher who helped record data for the study. Murphy says the team, "plans to dig deeper," with current theories suggesting that "the posts could be coming from a sweatshop in the Duderstadt basement."

At press time, researchers made the shocking discovery that all 400 Piazza posts originated from a single student who mistakenly believed they were using Reddit the whole time.

Unclear If Girl Talking About Beautiful Man Or Heirloom Tomato

Friends of Johnson have been unable to determine whether the "red spots" on her neck were hickeys or just splattered tomato juice.

Friends of Abigail Johnson, a junior studying molecular biology, have recently reported being unable to tell whether she has a new crush or just consumed a freshly picked organic heirloom tomato.

"It's quite unclear who exactly she's talking about," explained her roommate, Tammy Fincher, "like I'll ask her how her day was and she'll launch into a whole thing about how it was great because she got to eat an absolutely delectable and life-changing specimen, but then continues to use words like 'juicy' and 'full of seeds' and it's not entirely clear where she's going with it."

Johnson's tendency to use male pronouns to describe inanimate objects has added further confusion.

"She'll just be standing in the kitchen gazing at the fruit bowl saying something about how 'he's so beautiful and gorgeous' and she 'can't wait to just cover him in balsamic glaze and eat him up,' and it really could just go either way," said Fincher.

Johnson's other friends also report being unclear about whether she's spending hours at the farmers market or at a guy's house.

"She'll leave for long periods of time, sometimes super early, and none of us will hear from her until she gets back and tells us about how it was the 'most satisfying experience of a lifetime' or something. Is it a sneaky link or is it a tomato? We really don't know," said Johnson's best friend Maria Kinney.

At press time, Johnson was seen sobbing in front of the campus farm stand, although it was unclear whether she had just been broken up with or just been told they were out of tomatoes.

Survey Finds CS Majors, North Campus Tour Guides, Gay Men Most Likely Groups To Nap "Inside Dude"

Results of a recent survey published by U-M Student Life yielded an unusual correlation between campus nap spots and sexual orientation. Among survey respondents who identified as male and homosexual, 78.3% selected "inside Dude" as their preferred nap spot.

LSA senior Matthew Gonzalez, who identifies as gay, explained his survey responses. "Normally, I just slip in through the back door and get all my business done," he said. "After I finish, it's a warm and comfortable place to nap inside, and that helps me relieve stress especially during midterm season. Also, I usually stay on the top of the Dude," Gonzalez added, making a stacking motion with his hands. "But I do occasionally get on the bottom floor to switch things up."

Unfortunately, not all of Gonzalez's naps inside the Dude have been positive experiences. "It's kind of awkward sometimes when I sleep too long. I wake up disoriented and realize there's a stranger next to me. I have to be careful to be quiet when I'm getting my stuff and leaving so I won't disturb them."

Survey author Randall Davis was "floored" by the survey responses. "It's a strange correlation because the overwhelming majority of students who study in the Dude are engineering or computer science majors, but the majority of gay students are not in either of those fields. Statistically speaking, it doesn't make sense."

When asked if he plans to keep frequenting the Duderstadt in his last few semesters, Gonzalez claimed, "I've never been there, actually."

Old Coffee Stain Sticky, Gross, Lowkey Smells Good

Engineering senior Adrian Li reportedly studied in the Duderstadt homework Monday afternoon, and claimed that he "couldn't help but feel pretty grossed out by the old spilled coffee stain on [the] table," despite being "comforted" by the smell it was still wafting.

"I mean, who the hell doesn't have the time to clean up the mess they made?" Li said. "I didn't notice it immediately and it became absorbed into my thermodynamics papers. Though, I have to say, the lingering odor of vanilla is a fairly pleasant complement to my work."

The accidental dribble had been there since Architecture junior Christian Mayer sat there that morning to enjoy a cappuccino from Mujo Café. Witnesses say his drink splashed while leaving to cram in the Duderstadt basement for the next 11 hours.

Later in the day, Engineering freshman Lucy Andrews unwittingly sat down at the stained table. "Whoever was here with that coffee definitely got something real sugary. The table is adhering to my elbow," Andrews said. "But hey, maybe the scent could do well as a new perfume on me."

"After I go to scan my finished work into a PDF to upload to Canvas, I'm sure the grader will judge me for the obvious paper stains, even though they weren't from me," Li later said. "Anyhow, now I'm wondering if I should get my own drink."

Sources claim that the Duderstadt Facilities Manager is considering maintaining the stain as a permanent installation.

At press time, Li was seen walking out of the Duderstadt with a travel-sized bag of sanitizing wipes and an Americano with two shots of vanilla.

Girl Sitting Next To You In Class Plotting How To Kill You In The Sims Tonight

Students in ANTHRO 101 report that classmate Claire Mitchell spends most of the class time thinking of how she is going to kill her fellow classmates in the Sims that evening.

"I thought something was weird when I asked to see her notes and just saw images of people drowning in pools without ladders and burning to death while trying to cook a grilled cheese," said classmate Peter Young, who sits next to Claire. "I was like, do I need to call CAPS?"

Classmate Andrea Garcia said, "One time the professor called on me to answer the question instead of Claire. My friend heard her whisper under her breath that I was 'going to pay for it' and 'get eaten by a cowplant.' Sounds like some witchcraft to me."

When asked about the drawings, Mitchell said, "I mean, who doesn't sit in class and think about murdering their classmates. There's that one guy who wouldn't shut up during lecture and the whole time I think about wanting to strangle him. But instead of committing a crime, I just go home, open my laptop, spend an hour making an extremely detailed recreation of him in the Sims, and then trap him in a little square room until he starves to death. I get the satisfaction without the jail time, and he gets to live. It's a win-win."

At press time, Mitchell was seen naming Minecraft sheep after her roommates before unleashing her pack of dogs on them.

Man Riding Unicycle Takes Out Three On Diag

Binns has reportedly petitioned the city council to add "unicycle only lanes" to State Street.

Recent reports from DPSS indicate that there were three casualties when Brendan Binns, CS major and rogue unicyclist, crashed into people on the Diag early Saturday morning.

"I was walking with my headphones in, dodging parents taking photos with the Block M, when out of nowhere I saw this guy careening towards a tour group," explained Mia Chen, who witnessed the incident. "I thought it was just a normal bike but realized there were too few wheels for that to be the case"

Liam Strauss, another student who witnessed the incident, said, "Dude it was crazy. I'm used to dodging guys on those one wheel balancing things but this guy was on a proper unicycle. I was lowkey impressed how [sic] the guy kept going after hitting the first one."

"Unicycle riding's just in my blood," said Binns when questioned about the incident. "It just allows you more motion than walking ever could. How else am I supposed to navigate the small curb near my house or effortlessly weave through crowds of people in the chem building?"

Friends of Binns report that prior to the incident he was telling them that "people don't respect the act of unicycling anymore" and that he wanted to "increase the awareness of unicyclists in the public consciousness" by riding his unicycle around "as often as possible."

At press time, Binns was seen attempting to attach a Boober carriage to his unicycle to "make some extra money on the weekends."

Regents Pledge To Start Listening To Students, Faculty In Order To More Effectively Ignore Students, Faculty

The University of Michigan's Board of Regents has pledged to abandon their previous aloof and disconnected ways in favor of a greater responsiveness to the campus community, specifically for the purpose of more effectively ignoring said campus community.

"We're proud to announce the establishment of the new Institute for Town Halls and Responsive Governance," said regent Jordan Acker. "Through this program we hope to hear every grievance that the university community has for us, so we can change none of our behaviors and continue being the leaders and the best in these critically important areas."

The program has already achieved some notable successes according to U-M interim president Domenico Grasso.

"We really enjoyed messing around with the statement of student rights and responsibilities," Grasso said. "I really appreciated all of the students and faculty who told me about all of the things that go into due process, it made it much easier to systematically dismantle it all. I'll be out of here pretty soon anyways, so it's no skin off my back."

Regent Sarah Hubbard said she hoped to cultivate an environment of respectful dialogue on campus.

"Always remember, we hate you and we don't care if you live or die," Hubbard said. "You are nothing to us, our terms will outlast your pitiful four years here by centuries, and any attempt to change things will be met with the harshest crackdowns and cruelest laughter imaginable. On an unrelated note I'm appalled that debate has gotten so uncivil around here lately."

Obnoxious Couple Unfortunatley Has Great Costume

Five Minute Break In Middle Of Lecture Perfect Time To "Stare Into Abyss"

Students have reported that five minutes is just long enough to realize that the abyss is staring back.

Recent data shows that offering short breaks in the middle of lectures provides the perfect opportunity for students to "stare into the abyss for a few minutes."

Professors often offer short breaks in the middle of long lectures to help students relax and regroup for the second half of class, but these findings suggest that many students are actually choosing to use this time to detach from reality and "gaze into the chasm."

Chemistry professor Joan Williams has noticed that many of her students are using her five minute class break in this way. "Last lecture, I looked around my class and noticed about half of the students were getting a drink of water or chatting with the people around them," she said. "The other half, however, were glassy-eyed and silently staring off into the distance, lost in thought."

LSA Junior Jerry Muncy says he prefers to use his class breaks to have "existential moments." "This past class, I was so deep into the void of my mind, I'm pretty sure I figured out the meaning to everything," Muncy said. "But when Professor Williams resumed class, I forgot it all."

At press time, Muncy emailed his professor to let her know that the "whispering, malicious voices" weren't being properly picked up by the lecture capture recording.

Club You Never Go To Kinda Like Bitch Ex-Wife

After successfully avoiding his crocheting club for weeks, junior Markus St. Claire has remarked that the group is kind of like having a "bitch ex-wife" due in part to its constant "nagging emails."

In an interview St. Claire explained, "We're talking like three, four emails a week, begging me to attend one of those goddamn meetings." After being in the club for three years, he "sent an email asking to be taken off the mailing list." Now he asks, "When will they realize we're over? That was months ago."

"And their new thing is asking me for money all the time," St. Claire complains. "What do you mean dues? Even if I was still part of the club, which I'm not, I wouldn't be paying twenty dollars a semester to crochet. I can crochet on my own time." He adds, "Why buy the cow when you can get the milk for free?"

"The other day," St. Claire continued, having pulled out his phone, "I'm pretty sure the President was drunk emailing me– telling me how much she misses me and how empty the club felt without me. Quite frankly I find it pretty unprofessional."

In response to the claims, crochet club president Gabriella Nunez said, "Markus had been coming to my club for years. For him to just quit out of nowhere was super unwarranted…I wonder if he's seeing another club." After taking a moment to herself, Nunez begged, "Markus, please come home! Your unfinished projects miss you!"

At press time, St. Claire was spotted signing up for the younger, hotter knitting club.

Two Guys Sitting Next To You In The Ugli Randomly Burst Into Elaborate Tap Routine

Last Wednesday, while sophomore Henry Anderson was writing an essay for his history class on the second floor of the Ugli, two guys sitting next to him suddenly burst into an elaborate tap routine.

"I was just getting started on a paragraph about Alexander the Great when I heard this weird clacking sound," Anderson said. "At first, I thought it was someone's keychain or maybe a pen clicking, but then I saw a shoe behind my laptop. I know it sounds ridiculous, but I swear these two guys just stopped typing, put on tap shoes, got up on the table, and started going."

"They were doing the 'Moses Supposes' routine from Singin' in the Rain," explained musical theater junior Emily Wang, who was seated across from Anderson and the dancers. Wang was "awed" by the performance. "I mean, it's a pretty hard routine, and the guy doing Gene Kelly's part was just fantastic. I think he'd be perfect for my production of 'Anything Goes' this winter."

The pair's masterful tapping attracted the attention of the entire floor. "Everyone was really getting into it," stated Anderson. "People started cheering and whistling… it was honestly really heartwarming."

At the end of the routine, the duo received a thunderous round of applause. They then reportedly sat down and resumed working on their EECS 183 assignment.

College House Room Sizes Promoting Body Dysmorphia

Ann Arbor off-campus leasing company Wildwood Properties has come under fire recently for promoting body dysmorphia among renters due to their unusually small room sizes.

Current tenant Kaylie Williams has led the charge in speaking out against Wildwood. "When I get up from the toilet, my knees hit the bottom of the sink," Williams wrote in her initial complaint. "That's unacceptable."

Williams' report, co-signed by her five housemates, details several other concerns, including having to "crab walk" through the main hallway, slip through a crack in the wall to enter the living room, and continuously face issues with the functionality of their kitchen appliances. The housemates share concerns that Wildwood may be intentionally encouraging unhealthy practices in order to comply with the conditions of their properties.

"We at Wildwood completely reject that claim," says company spokesperson, landlord, handyman, interior designer, and contractor A.J. Buckleman. "I was at that house recently and, if my memory serves me correctly, nearly every door could almost completely open without slamming into furniture—where else in this town are you going to find that?"

Despite continuing to deflect these worrying allegations, Wildwood has reached a compromise with their accusers, agreeing to decrease rent prices from "horrifying" to, simply, "astronomical."

Residents also reported their suspicion that all mirrors in the house were funhouse mirrors designed to make their images appear far wider than in reality.

Shoeshiners In Washington, DC To Be Replaced By MAGA Bootlickers

With plenty of high ranking officials and politicians in the nation's capital, appearance is everything from the head down to the shoes. Shoeshiner companies are firing their long tenured workers and replacing them with professional bootlickers.

According to Barron Carson, the owner of Spit-Shine 'Em Clean, which was founded during the Reagan administration, this decision was to "help people pull themselves up by their bootstraps."

"The price of shoe polish has been through the roof ever since this whole tariff fiasco," Carson said. "That's when I thought of something genius - these MAGA folk would do basically anything to lick the boots of our Republican officials, and at a very low price. Plus it will add even more jobs to the market"

The shoeshiner booths in front of the Capitol Building are already being replaced by MAGA hat-wearing Republicans in the table top yoga position. According to Spit-Shine 'Em Clean employee Cleetus Bennett, this is a "great opportunity to rub elbows (or tongues) with her representatives."

"I took this opportunity for just 73 cents an hour," Bennett said. "I finally get to do something for our representatives, as they have worked so hard for making our lives so much better. In between licks, I also give advice on how to deal with the dirty migrant problem, as well as how to increase prices for everyday Americans. If I am lucky, they give me a nice kick at the end of my work as a tip."

Other ways the area is trying to cut down on costs is by replacing chairs with MAGA kiss-asses, toilet paper with MAGA brown-nosers, and massage parlors with MAGA back-scratchers.

Spit-Shine 'Em Clean has recently declared they are "vehemently against" joining the National Shoeshiner's Union.

Your Nine Year Old Cousin Asking For Skims Shapewear, IUD

Local reports have surfaced of a nine-year-old girl who recently handed her mother a birthday wish list featuring a plethora of items, including Skims shapewear and an intrauterine device (IUD).

"My birthday is coming up, and I need to update my makeup and wardrobe," said recent 4th-grade graduate Hayleigh Bleighderleigh. "My mom gave me a budget of only $200 because she said I 'already have too much stuff,' but that's fucking bullshit and she's a dumb bitch who barely finished high school."

"I don't think what I'm asking for is unreasonable at all. Everybody at school already has these things," Bleighderleigh continued. "All I asked her for was a Sephora gift card, Drunk Elephant moisturizer, the Rhode Peptide Lip Tint, a pink Owala, the Lululemon Everywhere Mini Belt Bag, a mini Longchamp tote to carry my colored pencils and reading log for school, Skims shapewear to snatch my waist and make sure I'm slaying, and of course, an IUD, because Alix Earle has one."

Witnesses report seeing Bleighderleigh at a consultation appointment for an IUD last Friday, advising her OB-GYN to quit her day job and become a content creator instead. When her request for an IUD was denied, Bleighderleigh reportedly told the doctor she "would never make it as a lifestyle influencer" and was a "big fat ugly hoe with gaping pores."

At press time, Bleighderleigh was seen adding an at-home pap smear test kit to her Amazon wishlist.

Skinniest Fat Bear Week In History As Ozempic Gains Popularity In Katmai National Park

As Fat Bear Week has gained national attention, researchers in Alaska's Katmai National Park have reported this year's competition to be the skinniest on record as popular weight loss drugs, like Ozempic, have gained popularity amongst bears.

Fat Bear Week is an annual competition between "fat bears" in Katmai, aimed at crowning the "fattest bear" as the champion. The week is a celebration of fat bears as they prepare for hibernation.

"We are currently monitoring the spread of Ozempic in Katmai. We are especially concerned about the ability of the bears to catch salmon if they have Ozempic face," reported Claire Mantee, biologist in Katmai. "Our bears have not been this skinny since Cocaine Bear, it's really concerning," she continued.

Other weight loss trends have also gained popularity in Katmai. This year's winner, Chunk 32, was subject to controversy after allegations they had received a gastric bypass surgery. "I just climbed a lot of trees and went into a calorie deficit. I can send you my routine if you want," claimed Chunk.

Some bears reported that they opted for the Hims GLP-1 subscription for a more affordable alternative.

Uninsured bears have been turning to off-brand GLP-1 treatments like Wegovy and Zepbound. Amidst skyrocketing demand for the drugs, bears with diabetes have reported difficulty affording their Ozempic, lamenting that "other bears don't understand that I need this medication to survive."

At press time, a delivery driver from Hims, an Ozempic subscription service, was seen dropping off the weightloss drug in Katmai via flyover.

Performative Male Accidentally Discovers Passion For Black Feminist Literature

Recent reports indicate that Aidan Kruger, a young man described by former girlfriends as a "performative male" and "male manipulator" has inadvertently discovered a "genuine interest" in Black feminist literature.

"I bought a copy of All About Love so I could sit on the edge of the Diag and sip matcha. You know, for the alternative baddies." said the Economics junior as he thumbed through bell hooks' seminal work. "But I spent so long posing artistically with it that I actually got curious enough to read the thing. And wow, bell hooks writes so insightfully, and with such tenderness and humanity. When she said that 'lying diminishes and erodes the possibility of meaningful, caring connection, that it stands in the way of love'- like damn, I was just trying to get laid but now I can't even do that without a sense of existential dread that I've brutalized my inner self into being unloveable, ya know?"

The women in Kruger's life also noticed the change, with one noting "I know he bought that book so he could 'appeal to the female gaze' or whatever, but recently he's actually become a better person. He's actually treating women like full human beings. I think he's actually at a seminar on decolonial feminism right now. It's unbelievable." Aidan's partners do note that he has given up drinking matcha however, as it "tastes like grass."

Final reports suggest that Kruger plans to start Sister Outsider by Audre Lorde next.

ICE To Allow Agents To Wear Fun Masks For Halloween

In a recent agency-wide memo, acting ICE director Todd Lyons has informed agents that in celebration of the Halloween season, they will be permitted to wear "fun masks" and costumes as part of their uniforms.

Lyons framed the decision as a reward, citing the agents' "impressively heartless" behavior over the past nine months. "Every day these agents inspire me with how willing they are to entirely abandon compassion in pursuit of our agency's mission," said the director. "That dedication warrants a treat, on top of the $50,000 signing bonus we've already given many of them."

ICE agents have widely celebrated this move. "The buff I usually pull over my nose when extrajudicially disappearing people is great for shielding me from public accountability," said one officer wearing a mask. "But the fact that I can still recognize myself in the mirror forces me to reckon with who I have become. A Ronald Reagan mask should fix that."

"I think this will really improve my job performance," said another agent. "Putting on a Captain America mask will make me much more approachable to the children I'm separating from parents."

At press time, a popular choice amongst agents are Punisher masks. According to agents, many identify with the comic book character's violent tactics and mission, "as long as you ignore his goal of pursuing big-time criminals and corrupt government officials."

This announcement reportedly coincided with a skyrocketing in "sexy Gestapo" costume sales.

Space Warlords Of Alpha Centauri Close Airspace To Netanyahu

In a broadcast revealing their existence to Earth, The Coalition of Space Warlords of Alpha Centauri announced their decision to close their airspace to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. This comes after multiple nations of Earth announced their support for an arrest warrant for the Prime Minister.

"We cannot sit idly by and ignore the brutal cruelty Israel is committing against the Palestinian people" said Warlord Tar'Gul "Scourge of the Centauri" Skullmasher. "If Netanyahu approaches within even 1 parsec of Proxima Centauri we will immediately annihilate his spacecraft"

Some of the current warmongers facing prosecution by the Coalition were impressed by the charges brought against Netanyahu.

"His brutality to even the most defenseless refugees is something we've never managed to replicate, even in our most devious atrocities" said an interstellar war criminal who wished to remain anonymous. "We didn't even know it was possible to break a ceasefire treaty that many times."

At press time, Netanyahu responded to the announcement by saying that the space warlords were clearly covert Hamas officials that had colonized alien worlds, and could not be trusted.

Nature Valley To Develop Even Crumblier Bar

In a recent announcement to the press, Nature Valley CEO Clyde Geraine announced that the popular snack bar producer is engaged in research and development to produce "an even crumblier bar."

"We've been investing hundreds of thousands of dollars in cutting edge materials and chemistry research for the past few years," explained Laura Knuth, Head of Product Development at Nature Valley. "Our goal is to produce a substance so crumbly and fragile that it qualifies as a new state of matter. And then we're gonna stick that substance in our bars."

"Whenever I eat one of those bars, my favorite part of the experience is vacuuming my floor and then vacuuming it again later when I discover even more crumbs," said long-time Nature Valley customer David Oats. "Personally, I'd like to see a bar so crumbly that shrapnel gets into my eyes when I take a bite."

Leaked patents filed by Nature Valley have included designs with "smaller grain sizes," "weaker binding agents," and one design with "a spring activated spike that shatters the bar instantly when you open the wrapper." According to Geraine, "we're going to bring customers what we know they want: something that strikes a perfect balance between breakfast and frag grenade."

Final reports show that Nature Valley profits have increased in recent weeks following the viral "eat the crumbled bar out of your hand like feeding a scared horse" TikTok challenge.

The move has been widely praised by ants, dogs, and horses.

Mr Beast Unveils New Lockheed Martin Partnership For 'Beast Bombs™'

The CIA is reportedly in early talks with Donaldson to work on new ways to psychologically damage and torture their captives.

Youtuber James "Jimmy" Donaldson, known online as MrBeast, recently unveiled his latest business venture called Beast Bombs™ in partnership with the company Lockheed Martin.

"I hope you enjoyed this EPIC new product launch," said Donaldson in a YouTube video where he unveiled the product by putting contestants through a series of bombings with the last survivor winning $100,000. "No other Youtuber has ever had a chance to make this explosive of an impact! Be on the look out for mind blowing prizes, one lucky recipient will be entered to win an aid truck full of Feastables."

Lockheed Martin representative Amanda Perez said in a statement that, "[the company] is always looking to push boundaries and expand into new industries. We look forward to connecting with fans on a personal level and indoctrinating young boys into the military industrial complex even earlier."

Billy, a nine-year-old fan of MrBeast, said, "Bruh, you can do Fortnite in real life? Chat THAT'S SO SKIBIDI!" His friend Tyler, also nine, said, "[Mr. Beast] is so sigma! +100 aura."

A spokesperson for Donaldson said, "We were looking for a way to disrupt the military industrial complex. Like Lunchly [another of Donaldson's ventures], it's about interacting with people in a fun, explosive, market breaking kind of way. We're changing what battlefields look like across the globe."

At press time, Donaldson was talking to pharmaceutical companies about releasing a brand of erectile dysfunction treatments called Beast Mode.

Two Cannibals On Podcast Just Glad They Can Have Civil Conversation About Whether To Eat Guest

In an episode of CannibalCast, posted to alternative video platform Rumble.co last week, co-hosts Andy Hackett and Ethan Schraub said they were glad they could have a "civil conversation" about whether to kill, cook and eat their guest, Taylor Garcia.

Before discussing Garcia's fate, Hackett established how much the discussion would benefit society. "It's so important in a democracy to have conversations like this," Hackett said. "If we can't talk across divides, then we're just doomed, man."

Regarding the matter at hand, Hackett insisted that the two hosts should have Garcia for dinner while Schraub, who said his role on the show is to "balance out [Hackett's] more extreme views," politely raised concerns about the ethics of cannibalism. "Me personally," Schraub said, "and this is just my opinion, but I'm not so sure this is totally okay."

Garcia made a scene while objecting to the discussion, screaming and crying in a desperate attempt to derail Hackett and Schraub's careful weighing of the pros and cons of consuming her flesh. Her incivility shocked the two hosts.

"That's no way to engage in a discussion," Schraub said. "You have to be respectful if you want this to be productive."

Ultimately, Hackett and Schraub ended up agreeing to disagree over whether to braise Garcia or slow roast her on a spit over an open flame, deciding to do half one way and half the other. In addition, they agreed with little debate to pair Garcia with a fine red wine.

DPSS Recommends Bolting Bike Directly To Own Skeleton To Prevent Theft

In response to a recent surge in bike thefts, DPSS has published new guidelines outlining that students should "anchor the bike directly to their skeleton with at least 13mm steel chain" in order to prevent these crimes.

"We've seen a surge in bike theft for sure," said DPSS head of unimportant crimes Stacy Moylan. "And it just pisses me off when these kids come in asking me about it, like it's my job to keep track of their belongings."

Those that have undergone the procedure say it's painful, but worth it. "I got my bike stolen a couple of months ago and it was a real pain, so when I got my new one I knew I had to do a better job protecting it," said junior Gregorio Moreno. "Now that I have this chain installed in my hip, I never need to worry about somebody stealing my bike, it just comes with me everywhere. It barely even hurts anymore and the fainting has pretty much stopped."

According to those close to the matter, bike thieves remain unfazed. "I've cut through three chains to get a bike," said one thief who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "One time someone locked up the front wheel and seat separately, so I left them there and rode the whole way back popping a wheelie and just sitting with the rod up my ass. You think a little bit of flesh is gonna stop me?"

At press time, two-thirds of Moreno was seen being dragged down the road behind his bike. The other third did not respond to a request for comment.

Child Vomiting

Recent reports coming from Ms. Hawley's first grade classroom confirmed this morning that local child Bradley Fuchs has suddenly begun vomiting.

"It came out of nowhere," said first-year teacher Olivia Hawley. "One second he was happily working on arts and crafts and having fun with friends, and the next he was uncontrollably barfing all over himself. It was a huge mess"

Janitor Tom Wheelan corroborated the teacher's account. "This might be the most vomit I've ever seen in one place," said the twenty year veteran of the school district. "It took almost half a bag of cat litter to clean up. The kid got some good range on it too."

Soon after the incident, witnesses confirmed that the six-year-old was "back to his chatty self" and "completely unfazed," despite the seemingly violent nature of the gastrointestinal event.

"The last time I vomited that much of my body weight in such a short time, I was a college freshman in the ER with alcohol poisoning," said school nurse Brenda Johannsen. "It took me days to recover from that, but as soon as I got him a change of clothes, he ran off to lunch for a sloppy joe. It's pretty remarkable."

According to Patricia Kimberly, a longtime kindergarten teacher, incidents like this aren't uncommon. "The only thing these kids do more often than vomit is piss themselves," said Kimberly. "They haven't got a clue what their bodies are telling them."

Fuchs quickly recovered from the incident to show his teacher his really cool dance moves.

Final Insect Species Discovered: "Yep, That's All Of Them"

Dr. Beatsley was reportedly considering coming out of retirement after spotting an "extremely fucked up little bug" on a leaf.

The biology world is abuzz this week with the discovery of a new species of insect deep in the Cambodian jungle. The creature, which resembles a very small crab with the face of a crooked politician, was found by renowned biologist Dr. Bill Beatsley. He was reportedly "thrilled" by the discovery after it was confirmed to be the "final remaining undiscovered insect on Earth."

"Yep, that's all of them," said Dr. Beatsley, "the whip-hipped basketball thrip, as we have named it, was the last one. There's exactly 3,728,901 species of insects. I can retire now."

Some experts expressed confusion as to the methods used to confirm that there aren't any more species to discover, but senior researcher Wendy Takovic reassured the scientific community at a press conference on Thursday, saying "We double checked and, yeah, there's 3,728,901 bugs. Like, you can check if you want but that's just the number. Number 807,234 is the Rhinoceros Beetle. Number 2,474,311 is one of the lesser weevils. Number 3,728,901 is the whip-hipped basketball thrip. And that's the last one, we checked. Seriously, I invite you to check my notes here, I'm not making this up."

Entomologists across the world are packing up their offices and preparing to settle into retirement. Many are excited to go home, such as Ricky Pilsner, who says he is very excited to "stop lookin' at fuckin' bugs all the time." Others are disappointed that the field of research that they've committed their lives to is now "done." The most disappointed of all is Dr. Beatsley himself. At press time, he stated that the whip-hipped basketball thrip, "isn't even a good bug. It kind of sucks."

Elderly Man Insistent On Referring To Farting As "Passing Wind"

Reports from family and friends indicate that area old man Randy Edwards is insistent on using the term "passing wind" to refer to flatulence.

Sarah Edwards, Randy's daughter, says that her father typically starts each morning by letting everyone know that the "early bird gets the worm," and then apologizing for "passing wind."

"Sure, he's a product of his time," said Sarah. "But at this point, I think he's making everyone a little uncomfortable with his fixation on using euphemisms to describe his untimely bowel disruptions."

Sarah also explained that her father has been instilling his terminology into her children. "I don't know what world I'm living in," she said. "These days, whenever my children have to use the restroom, they say they have to 'see a man about a horse'."

Randy, on the other hand, says his use of the term is "purely a sign of respect to whoever is around [him]." He continued, saying "these youngsters are far too comfortable with their vulgar vocabulary. I fear that common decency is a lost art."

At press time, Randy was overheard using politically incorrect language to refer to minorities.

Local Boyfriend-Material Ruins Chances After Asking For Relationship

Lidia Moon, a sophomore in the College of Engineering, reports that she was forced to abruptly end her situationship with Randy Hunter after Hunter asked for a relationship.

Moon said that she thought she "liked him until he asked to make it official." Moon explained that "he's just too needy now, wanting to call me his girlfriend and stuff. Like, the sex is one thing, but I don't get why he feels like he deserves boyfriends privileges. He didn't even get me flowers for my birthday."

"Honestly, he took all of the fun out of this." Anna Kratz, Lidia's roommate, complained. "Before Randy asked to give it a label, Lidia would talk to me for hours about how badly she wanted him to. There's no thrill now that he wants something mutually secure." Anna later added that she has "hope that Lidia won't delete her Hinge account" because Anna likes "to message people as her."

After a thrilling eight week journey that included several dozen Instagram posts, a pregnancy scare, and, according to Moon, even an "I love you" to her from Hunter, she came to the definitive conclusion that "he's too clingy for a boyfriend" after he asked her if she would make their relationship official.

Investigation Confirms Stephen Miller Does Not Have More Than Eight Squirrels Stapled To Office Door

In response to a request for comment at a White House press conference, Press Secretary Karoline Leavitt said, "Wait, you're not Fox or NewsMax. How the fuck did you get in here?"

A team of investigative journalists has confirmed that senior Trump administration advisor Stephen Miller does not have ten squirrels stapled to his office door, despite rumors to the contrary.

The claims that Miller has nine bloody, decomposing squirrels attached to his door through the use of a common office implement were also disproven.

Whether Miller has eight squirrels stapled to his door remains uncertain.

"I can't confirm or deny any rumors," one White House staffer said. "Miller does walk around with these weird red stains on his suit a lot, but I think it's ketchup. There's usually some kind of hair on there too. I think he owns a cat or something, but I've never heard him mention one."

Miller's office could not be inspected due to a series of locks, nailed boards and chains which prevented the door from being opened. A rotting smell emanated from the room, though the reporters were unable to confirm if it originated from squirrels.

Attorney General Pam Bondi, whose office is located in the White House supply closet, said she has observed Miller "stopping by to pick up boxes of staples way too fucking often."

At press time, Miller was seen foaming at the mouth and crawling around the White House lawn at 2:00 in the morning for an unknown reason.

NYT Invents New Shape In Attempt To Find More Sides To Story

In their attempt to represent all sides of current events, The New York Times editorial board has managed to invent a brand new shape with more sides than previously thought possible.

"This new shape will allow us to make sure that every side of every story we bother to cover will be equally represented, regardless of its merit," said editor-in-chief Joseph Kahn. "We'll now be able to pen hagiography of recently deceased political figures or directly contradict experts in dozens more dimensions."

Despite receiving backlash for publishing op-eds that readers claimed espoused poorly supported and unpopular political takes, opinion editor Kathleen Kingsbury has defended the move. "The hyper-dimensionality of this new polytope will enable us to find even less reputable columnists to write about yet more obscure facets to the issues we cover," said the former Pulitzer Prize winner.

In a press release, The Times claimed this new hypercube, which they're naming "The Overtonogon," will help them cover "every point of view, no matter how far removed it is from the story." The press release cited a recent instance where the Overtonogon revealed the paper had neglected to cover how the New York City mayoral race would affect Iowan retirement communities.

The Overtonogon has recently been deployed to find out how white supremacist organizations have been affected by DEI.

Jason Sobel, The Times' chief technology officer, celebrated this new achievement. "Even if our groundbreaking hypercube doesn't win us a Pulitzer, we should still be in the running for a Fields Medal."

At press time, the famed newspaper was considering modifying its tagline to: "All the news that's fit to print, and then some that maybe isn't."

Establishment Insists Lone Wolf Political Violence Can't Be Allowed To Get In The Way Of Good, Old-Fashioned Bipartisan State Violence

After various instances of political violence committed by ordinary citizens shocked the nation, America's political, media, and corporate establishments have made it clear that such lone-wolf attacks "cannot be allowed to obstruct the brutal, ever-churning machinery of normal state violence."

Despite deep political divides, the whole political establishment is united in opposition to violence perpetrated by regular citizens. Senate minority leader Chuck Schumer (D-NY) strongly voiced his opposition to such violence in a Tuesday morning press conference. "We can't just have random psychos going around attacking people for peaceful political activity," Schumer said. "Only psychos with badges should be able to do that."

Rep. Josh Hawley (R-MO) highlighted the particular importance of sheltering vulnerable law enforcement from attacks. "If we just let people fight back against ICE then they won't be able to kidnap, brutalize, and kill people with complete impunity. It would be pure chaos!"

Late night host Bill Maher placed the issue in the context of American history and our founding values. "Of course, I have serious disagreements with what President Trump is doing on many issues," Maher said. "But if they knew independent citizens were committing acts of political violence just because they didn't like what the government was doing, the founding generation who fought and died to create this country would be turning in their graves."

At press time, the establishment also made it clear that "political violence is 100% fine as long as you target the right people, such as civil rights advocates."

They Took Everything From Me By: 68

Those motherfuckers. I had it all man, I had it all! I was used to being in 69's shadow. I made the most of it. "Who wants to be the 'funny' sex number kids say all the time anyway?" That's what I used to think. But then here comes old 67. He took all my thunder!

I had a wife, I had kids, I'm divisible by 2 for chrissake! Now that is all gone. My wife left me for him, and I only get to see my kids on weekends now because of 67. He's a dirty primer! Can't be divided by anything but one. I can't go anywhere without seeing his face, man.

This has happened before too. When the whole 21 fiasco happened, I was a little worried, but I knew it would blow over. Our cousin 420 had a big break with the potheads, but I didn't want to be associated with the stoners anyway. This motherfucker 67, though, is rubbing me the wrong way. It's all empty fame, and he switched up on his day ones. I can't fuck with that.

When I caught him sleeping with my wife, 41, I knew my life was over. I knew my shot at fame would never happen. Now I will always be the little brother, the biggest "what-if" story, with nothing to show for it. And 67 took it all away from me.

You've Never Seen A Cop Show Like This Before By: A CBS Executive

I know what you're thinking: we have enough crime shows where the main character is an emotionally closed off muscleman or a quirky and underestimated woman who's earned her way into this world and deserves the credit. I know. I get it. But this is different. This is new, innovative. This isn't Blue Bloods or CIA or CSI: Vegas or Elsbeth or FBI or FBI: International or FBI: Most Wanted or Matlock or Sheriff Country or Tracker or Watson or NCIS or NCIS: Hawai'i or NCIS: Sydney or NCIS Origins. No, this is brand spankin' new. This has never been seen on television before.

You think you know crime procedurals? You don't. You've never seen morally questionable investigations like this one before. These prosecutors aren't regular prosecutors – they're also unusually lenient. These defense attorneys? Whew. They're the dumbest schmucks on Earth and they have never failed like they're about to fail on your TV at 7pm central. Prime time baby.

All other shows have taken place in the same cities – I'm talking New York. I'm talking Las Vegas. I'm talking LA. I'm talking about Nashville. But you know what we haven't seen before: Pittsburgh. Phoenix.

Throw a little Fayetteville in, a little Raleigh, and you're in territory that no one has ever dared to venture into.

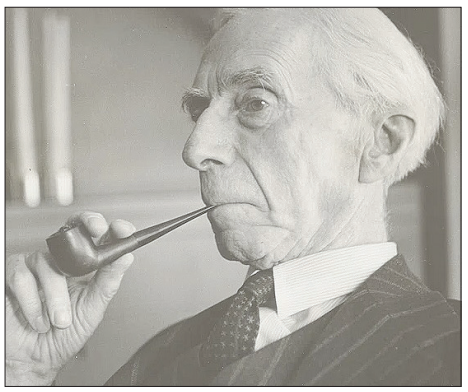
So get ready to see the story of the rookie's rookie and his questionably inappropriate relationship with a quirky forensic scientist. And when you're sick of them, don't even worry about it because we'll have you covered with a hospital and firehouse spinoff. But until that day comes, sit back, relax, and enjoy nine seasons of people not knowing what a two way mirror is.

Well, Here's The Deal, You See

By: Man Holding Pipe In Mouth

Well, chap, here's the deal, you see, because there's always a deal, and if there isn't, by Jove, we'll invent one out of thin air and a spot of marmalade. The whole blasted world's gone sideways, old bean, topsy-turvy and all that.

Now, listen here, fella. I daresay we've got quite a situation on our hands. Mmm, yes, you see, we're about to crack the case, you see, and old sport, say, that's the ticket! Egads! You've got some moxie, kid, and I've half a mind to write a letter to your old man and smack you upside the head with this here pipe I'm holding here, mm, yes. Time is a cruel mistress and a slippery customer, and the game's afoot, and I'm holding this here pipe, you see, with my mouth, you see, that I'm holding this pipe in, you see. I'm wearing a trenchcoat, old chap, mm, yes, indeed I am, and the game's afoot.



And so, well, here's the rub, you see, the rub being a metaphorical one, not the sort you'd find in a back alley massage parlor near Piccadilly, no sir, not with this here calabash in my mouth, no sir, yes, this calabash which is another word for a pipe. Well, I shimmied down and gone 'round the bend to the haberdashery the other day, by Jove I did, with this here calabash, or in other words pipe, in my mouth, yes sir I did.

Caring About People Is Good

By: A Nihilistic Radical Left Terrorist Who Is Also Transgender

Yeah, I'm pretty fucking extreme. I am truly radical. You may need to brace yourself for this, because it's really crazy: I believe that caring about people is good. Mhm, I said it. And I don't give a shit what you think about it.

Why do I believe this? Because I'm a nihilist, of course. Famously, the core pillar of nihilism is empathizing with other human beings and wanting them to be treated well regardless of identity or social status. Nothing says "I don't care about anything" quite like speaking up for the oppressed. When I really want to show that I don't give a fuck about shit, I take time out of my life to protest injustice even in the face of increasingly militarized and unaccountable law enforcement.

Just so everyone is clear, I am a terrorist. Terrorism is defined as "any speech or action, no matter how peaceful, that hurts the feelings of fascists." Pretty cut and dry. I am a radical left terrorist, and I am proud of it. It's also essential to understand that I do all of these horrible things, such as holding signs and posting on social media, because I hate America. It's not because I believe America's promise of liberty and justice for all can be achieved if only we fight for it. Nope, just hate America and hate God.

Oh, and also I'm transgender. Obviously.

Checkmate, Liberals: The Sky Has Turned Red

By: A Free-Thinker

Well, the day has come, Liberals. The sky has finally turned red. You may not like it, but you're gonna have to get used to it. Why has the sky turned red? We're not actually sure, but we think Trump did it. While you blue-haired crybabies were screaming about getting misgendered at Starbucks, the Republican party focused on the issues that really matter. Now, finally, the sky has turned red.

White House insiders are reporting that the torrent of blood running through the streets is "part of it," too. This will likely give Wall Street the kick in the pants that it needs to get our economy back on track, or finally drown all of those pesky homeless, or something. Ben Shapiro celebrated this victory on his podcast this week: "The radical left has finally lost. The Republican party is now in total control, and common sense has returned to every branch of the government. Now, did I expect the sky to turn red? No, of course not. However, seeing all of the screaming Liberals get totally epically destroyed by the gamma rays outside does get me pretty hard."

And to those of you that are worried about the 8 foot tall faceless beings walking around outside: don't worry, I think that's just ICE. Trump has this under control, trust me. This was always the end goal, apparently, and the presidential rocket to Mars is being constructed "just in case shit goes to fuck," which clearly won't be happening anytime soon. So get used to the new way of life, Liberals. Let's see you try to dye your hair blue after you go bald from radiation poisoning.
